Albertus Seba, born 1665, was a pharmacist in Amsterdam who offered ship captains and physicians money to bring him exotic creatures and stuff. He got rich selling worthless medicines made with them (snake oil! really! he was a snake oil producer and salesman, despite having nothing to do with the securities business) and also selling the critters to really rich guys like czars. He hired artists to produce engravings and drawings of them. While he did not produce the art himself, he was evidently very talented at managing its production, and the engravings he published were scientifically advanced then and artistically excellent then and now. While the images in this book are not nearly so thrilling as the actual engravings, they are an excellent introduction to his work and offer examples of how these might have been colored (by hand) at the time they were published. I bought this book as inspiration for coloring some of the 1734 engravings, and they are inspiring. However, the colors are not entirely accurate. The book contains some botanical names that the engravings do not, so you can look them up on "images". That handsome guy on the cover is an emerald tree boa. The infant snakes have the brownish colors of the snake on the cover, but the adults (the cover snake shape is adult) are brilliant green. oh well, this gives me license to color them however I want.

I purchased this book to use the photographs for art in my bedroom. It was much cheaper than buying another copy of the complete plates but just as beautiful. An amazing deal!
